

January 17th. '96.

My Own Darling,

It is quite late and your little girl is tired, though I'm sure I don't know what with.

I answered
your dear sister's letter today.
I received a note from my cousin, Mallinson Caudall, (who is organist of St Andrew's Church); this morning expressing his desire to call and make my acquaintance

I shall soon have such a list of calling acquaintances that I shall have to flee to Chicago in self defence

I had a grand lesson with Madame

Today, she was simply rapt over my singing and more than that, she is enthusiastic over me, myself; she says.

"Oh Mademoiselle Ernestine I have never a pupil like you. You are all soul and intelligence. You make me to ^(not do) overdo myself." Do you remember the "King" we heard in "Lohengrin, Plaucon, the great baritone. He is one of Madame's pupils, she trained him entirely. Many of the artists of the Italian Opera company are studying with her, while here in New York. They embrace the opportunity to brush up with a great teacher.

I shall write all this to Daddy, &c

You need not feel obliged to report to him.

I am so glad you have an assistant in the "Lure" work. If you ever chance to get hold of a copy of "Correll" read "Auf wieder sehen" I wanted to read it to you, once, but did not dare. I read it the other night, and saw that you could, and would, feel it now; And you would read it just as tenderly as you read that little letter from out of Egypt to me, one night, before the fire at your home, with the tears in your voice, my dear one.
Now Darling, a good night and a warm tender kiss from the one who is all all yours.
